REMARKS

2

3       The Examiner has rejected claims 1 through 14 under 35 U.S.C. 112.
4       Applicant has adopted the Examiner's suggestions to overcome the 5       informalities of the claims. As explained before, the Section 102 rejections
6       are now moot with the proposed amendments, except for the method claim
7       14.

8

9       With respect to the Section 103 rejections of claims 3-7 and 13, the 10      Examiner takes the position that the selection of the dosage is merely an 11      optimization with reasonable expectations of successfully providing an 12      effective treatment. Applicant disagrees and respectfully submits that the 13      Examiner has failed to carry the burden of proof under Section 103.

14

15       First, the solution in the present invention is acidic whereas Mr.
16      Yvin's solution is alkaline. This characteristic gives unexpected beneficial
17      properties to the solution. If anything, Yvin teaches away from the 18      invention. There is no showing in the record that would motivate someone 19      skilled in the art to "optimize" the concentration ranges to make the 20      solution acidic.

21

22       Yvin's solution is condensed to be an anti-inflammatory intended to 23      inhibit leukotrienes in the cells. The present solution acts (destroys) the 24      sputum structure, making it less thick in the respiratory tract and 25      facilitating its release through other mechanisms. These mechanisms
26      include increasing the water transport from the cells of the respiratory tract
27      into the lumen, stimulating the ciliary movement, causing a detergent
28      effect on the viral membranes (leading to destruction of viruses) and

1 serving as a vehicle for delivering other medications with a synergistic
2 effect.

3

4 With respect to the method claim 14, there is no indication of any 5 references where the seawater is extracted from a depth that will ensure 6 stability. Applicant has found this to be the best source of water for its 7 solution.

8

9 Applicant believes his application's claims are now allowable and 10 requests an early favorable action.

12 Respectfully submitted,
